

Male blood donor turned away for refusing to say if he was pregnant

Scottish GP who declined to answer 'bonkers' question denied right to go ahead with procedure

By Daniel Sanderson
SCOTTISH CORRESPONDENT

A MALE GP has been prevented from donating blood to the Scottish NHS after he refused to confirm whether or not he was pregnant. Steffen McAndrew, who works in Prestwick, South Ayrshire, said he had been turned away from a blood donation centre in nearby Ayr after he refused to answer the "bonkers" question.

The Scottish National Blood Transfusion Service (SNBTS) claimed the question had been introduced a year ago for "donor safety" with everyone expected to confirm if they are pregnant or had been recently, regardless of their sex.

The service said that it was updating the wording on its form, following a backlash, but still plans to have male donors respond to a question about whether or not they are pregnant.

Dr McAndrew said he had been a regular blood donor before the pandemic, and booked an appointment to donate at Belmont Academy on Tuesday for the first time since Covid struck. However, a nurse told him he would be unable to go ahead with the donation after he declined to answer the question on pregnancy which he suspected was included to "placate and pacify the gender brigade".

Some transgender activists say it is

Dr Steffen McAndrew was told that he could not donate blood as he had not confirmed whether or not he was pregnant possible for men to become pregnant, as they believe trans men, who were born female, are literally men. However, Dr McAndrew said he was a man and "therefore I cannot be pregnant".

Dr McAndrew told The Herald: "I can't believe they would refuse a donation from a man based on the fact I refused to say if I was pregnant."

"I can also understand those who have suggested, 'just tick the box', to enable a donation. However it is the principle of the matter. To say it is bonkers is an understatement. I have a nagging feeling that it is political correctness gone too far, trying to placate and pacify the gender brigade."

"I am hugely supportive of the blood transfusion service. They are vital to the day-to-day operation of the NHS. But I really think they are shooting themselves in the foot with this."

"It's a fundamental problem in the NHS, and society, that common sense has been lost, obliterated."

The Daily Telegraph disclosed last year that an internal report for NHS Scotland had called for "a general move away from gendered healthcare" to appease transgender patients.

Experts have raised fears that what activists see as "inclusive language" in the NHS is dehumanising and could confuse those who do not speak good English.

Following complaints, the SNBTS said it planned to change the wording on its form, with potential blood donors told to tick "no" to the pregnancy question if it is "not applicable".

An SNBTS spokesman said that the question "is asked for donor safety", adding: "We appreciate that for many donors (including some female donors such as post menopausal donors) this question will not be relevant."

"Following donor feedback, we are planning to update the wording of the question to 'Are you pregnant, or have you been pregnant in the last six months?' (If not applicable, please tick no)"

"This is likely to be implemented at the next donor health check update due in summer 2023."

Don't fret if your garden is wilting in the weather – Monty's is, too

By Ayomilekan Adegunwa

KEEN gardeners who found last year's flowers were late to bloom or only grew to half their usual height would be forgiven for thinking they had lost their green thumb, but it turns out that even Monty Don had trouble in his garden.

The horticulturalist has revealed he is set to swap the gingers, cannas and dahlias at Longmeadow, Herts, which is familiar to Gardener's World viewers, for "truly hardy" plants that can better weather the changing conditions.

The broadcaster and writer said the drought, mildness and extreme heat of the past 12 months saw a 50C difference between the hottest and coldest times of the year, which made conditions "unworkable" for many of his plants.

Speaking about the changing climate, the 67-year-old told the BBC Gardeners World Magazine: "It began not with drought and heat of last summer, but the drought and extreme mildness of the preceding winter."

"Then came last summer's heat and drought. The results were unexpected seemingly erratic."

"Sunflowers grew to half their size and floriferousness, the bananas did not grow at all."

"Our dahlias flowered up to six weeks later than normal, as did the gingers – and then only half heartedly."

When filming finished in November, the garden was packed up like usual. The flowers were dug up, potted, and stored in sheds and greenhouses, to keep away the winter rain, as well as the winter cold. However, last year the cold came much harder than anticipated, and dropped as low as -14C at Longmeadow.

He said the effects of climate change and the lurch between temperature extremes calls for a degree of watering in the summer that is "socially and practically undesirable – even if we did have our own unlimited supply in the middle of a drought, which we did not". He added that it means the plants he had before are no longer a practical option, and his garden will look "very different" next year. He plans on introducing a "new palette of perennial plants that are truly hardy", including some tree dahlias and ensete, adding that he is excited by the change and sees it as "more of an opportunity than a loss".

Seabird numbers drop after offshore wind farms erected

By Joe Pinkstone
SCIENCE CORRESPONDENT

POPULATIONS of a diving seabird plummeted by more than 90 per cent after offshore wind farms were built, a study has found.

Data from German scientists looked at the number of red-throated loons in the North Sea before and after the installation of five offshore wind farms.

Numbers of the bird were found to be up 94 per cent lower within 1km of the wind turbines, on average, after they were built. The impact was felt further afield too, with an average decline of 52 per cent in the bird numbers up to 10km from the turbines.

Wind turbines in the North Sea are seen as a key way to generate enough renewable electricity to allow for the phasing out of fossil fuels and to help reach net zero ambitions.

The study focused on five wind farms in the North Sea which are close to the coast of Denmark and Germany. One farm, called Butendiek, saw a 99 per cent decline in numbers of the birds.

The scientists, led by Kiel University, wrote: "In all cases, the wind farms created a kind of halo around these constructions, with low to very low abundances of loons."

The red-throated loon, also known as the red-throated diver, is the smallest and lightest of the UK's diving birds. Previous studies have found wind farms can affect other species, but no other seabird has been found to be so deleteriously impacted by offshore wind farms, the authors claim.

In the study, the scientists wrote: "Although renewable energies will be needed to provide a large share of our energy demands in the future, it is necessary to minimise the costs in terms of

94pc

The amount by which numbers of red-throated loons dropped within 1km of wind turbines after they were built less-adaptable species, to avoid amplifying the biodiversity crisis."

Aly McCluskie, senior conservation scientist at RSPB, told The Daily Telegraph that it is "vital that as we rapidly grow renewables as part of the imperative need to tackle climate change, we also ensure that we take action to protect and recover our marine environment by avoiding the most important places for wildlife and restoring nature to our seas at scale."

The research was published in the journal Scientific Reports.

Legal obstacle may torpedo Dambuster migrant camp plan

By Charles Hymas
HOME AFFAIRS EDITOR

A COUNCIL has pulled off a planning coup that could thwart the Home Office's proposals to turn the Dambusters' former base into a migrant camp.

RAF Scampton – the former home to the Dambusters' squadron and the Red Arrows – was yesterday given extra legal protection from the asylum seekers' scheme by being included in a new local regeneration plan.

West Lindsey district council believes it could provide the legal ammunition it needs to shoot down the Home Office's proposal to turn the former RAF base into a camp for 1,700 asylum seekers.

The site has been designated an "opportunity area" under the new local plan for central Lincolnshire, which is largely because the council has negotiated a £300million deal with developers to preserve the historic base as an operational aviation and aerospace hub and a new national heritage site.

It means that the Home Office could be found to be in breach of planning rules if it goes ahead with its asylum camp.

The council has already begun legal action by sending a pre-action letter to the Home Office ahead of seeking a judicial review of the asylum scheme.

the highest percentage in employment, at 80.4 per cent.

Almost half of specialist doctors in the UK are under "extreme strain" and the UK, new figures revealed yesterday, gave the highest stress levels compared with doctors in nine other high-income countries.

Analysis of census data by the Office for National Statistics (ONS) showed that 47.5 per cent of specialist medical practitioners, such as oncologists and cardiologists, were born abroad. France, Germany, the US, Canada, Sweden, Holland, Switzerland, Australia and New Zealand.

The largest foreign-born proportion came from the Middle East and Asia, at 26.3 per cent of specialists, followed by 8.5 per cent from Africa.

Two in five (40.6 per cent) of GPs were born outside the UK, the figures analysed data from a survey of 9,526 GPs across ten high-income countries, including 1,010 in the UK, carried out by the Commonwealth Fund.

and Wales (18.1 per cent) were both found to be dealing with higher workloads and mental health issues before the Covid pandemic, and said. One in 11 paramedics were also born outside the UK.

Chaand Nagpaul, a former British Medical Association council chairman, reported higher levels of emotional distress in the UK. "These figures highlight stress and bigger rises in workload than in nearly all other countries. Many abroad are an absolutely integral part of the NHS. We need to embrace them together, the report said. Seventy-one per cent of UK GPs said they found their job extremely or very stressful, the highest of the ten countries surveyed.

Hugh Alderwick, director of policy at the Health Foundation, said: "The NHS is not the only health system under pressure, but the experience of GPs in the UK should ring alarm bells in the government. General practice is the foundation of the NHS, yet GPs are telling us loud and clear that these foundations are creaking.

Overall data found that of all people aged 16 years and over in England and Wales, 55.9 per cent of those born in the UK were in employment on the day of the census in 2021.

That compared with 70.8 per cent of those born in the EU and 58 per cent among those born in non-EU countries. The ONS said the younger age and average age of those born outside UK was a factor. Within the EU-born population, Romania and Bulgaria had the highest rates of leaving their jobs."

Funding model doesn't let us help NHS, say pharmacists pharmacists, broadly speaking. I think that there is now convergence towards looking at a more private-funded model of care."

Pharmacists are increasingly likely to choose private work over NHS in recent weeks, large pharmaceutical chains such as Lloyds and Boots have announced plans to set up private services to supply prescription-only medicines.

Ministers have been keen to promote community pharmacies as an alternative source of care, potentially taking pressure off GP surgeries.

However, Ade Williams, a fellow of the Royal Pharmaceutical Society, told The Times Health Commission — a year-long inquiry into health and social care in the UK — that such a shift was not possible at scale under current rules.

Williams's pharmacy group has spearheaded initiatives such as blood pressure checks in pubs. "One of the reasons has driven me to innovate... is that you can't wait for the NHS to do them dispensing drugs, rather than providing other healthcare services. We will partner with private health organisations, we will go out into the community and deliver population health management, we will showcase what is done, but then to fund it, we need then funded more to dispense. So most people dispense."

"The fundamental bedrock of our problems is that community pharmacy has responded to the funding," he said. "So the funding model says that you do it, but then to fund it, we need then funded more to dispense. So most people dispense."

He added: "The NHS has never really been the most valuable NHS asset fully appreciated the skills and offerings of our community."

Man of steel...the bronze forerunner of Winston's full-size Commons statue

Six-figure sum for 2ft statue Churchill adored

THIS Sir Winston Churchill statue – loved by the wartime PM and his wife – may sell for a six-figure sum.

The 2ft tall bronze maquette is by sculptor Oscar Nemon, a confidant of the Second World War leader.

A one-off, it was the basis of the lifesize figure unveiled by Winston's widow Lady Clementine in 1969, four years after he died. She said of the Croatian refugee artist's work: "It represents to me my husband as I see him and as I think of him."

The statue is being sold by the family of late businessman Sir Edward du Cann. He bought it from fellow Tory MP Sir John Langford-Holt, who had obtained it from the sculptor. The lot includes a letter from Nemon saying the statue is "the first cast in bronze of the scale model of the statue of Sir Winston Churchill...unveiled in the Members Lobby of the House of Commons".

The April 5 auction is being run by Duke's, of Dorchester, Dorset. A spokesman said: "According to Nemon, Churchill was not an easy subject and he could be 'bellicose'. [They] developed a great rapport."

Police station displays poster classing rape as non-emergency

By Jack Hardy CRIME CORRESPONDENT

A POLICE force has faced a backlash over a poster saying that rape and sexual assault were “non-emergency” crimes that could be reported online.

Kent Police stuck the A4 printout on the window of the front door of a station in Maidstone, which placed the crimes alongside offences such as antisocial behaviour. The poster said the force’s website could also be used to send “compliments” and make “general inquiries”.

A picture of the poster was shared online and led to accusations that Kent Police was underestimating the seriousness of rape and sexual assaults. A Twitter user who posted the picture of the sign said: “How can you downplay such a horrific and violent crime? I get it’s hard to prove, but going about it like this ain’t the way.”

Kent Police claimed the sign had been placed in the window by a member of staff at the front desk, but it had since been replaced.

The force did not specify how long the sign had been on display in the window. A spokesman said: “Kent Police has been running a campaign called Click B4 U Call, aimed at encouraging people, where appropriate, to use the online reporting system rather than the 101 telephone number to free up contact handlers.

“The poster in question was put up by a member of police staff at the front counter in Maidstone police station but has since been removed and replaced by a poster clarifying our advice about how best to report crimes to us.”

Det Ch Supt Emma Banks, the force’s head of protecting vulnerable people, said: “We urge anyone to call us on 999 if there is a crime in progress or if someone is in immediate danger. Doing so can make the difference between arresting a suspect at the scene and in some cases saving a life. We also support victims in reporting offences in a number of other ways, often for crimes which are not in progress and which may have happened in the past. This can be done online, or through means including text messaging services.

“Kent Police takes the investigation of domestic abuse, rape and sexual assault extremely seriously and we support victims to come forward.”

Tory rebels in bid to ensure migrants can be removed

MPs prepare amendments to small boats Bill that would enable UK courts to ignore EU judgments

By Charles Hymas HOME AFFAIRS EDITOR

TORY backbenchers will try to toughen the Government’s new illegal immigration laws by giving UK courts the power to ignore rulings by Strasbourg judges.

The rebel MPs are preparing to lay amendments today designed to ensure plans to detain and remove migrants within weeks of arriving in the UK illegally can go ahead, irrespective of any judgments from the European Court of Human Rights (ECHR).

Ministers believe the Illegal Migration Bill does comply with the European Convention on Human Rights and other international laws but have admitted that there is a more than 50 per cent chance it could be ruled as being in breach by the courts.

If the legislation was ruled as non-compliant, the amendments would instruct the courts to ignore any rulings from the ECHR, effectively giving priority to the Government’s Bill over European judges.

It is understood the amendments are being backed by as many as 40 Conservative MPs representing a broad range of different groups in the party. They are due to be considered next week when the Bill comes before the Commons for its committee stage.

There is also sympathy among some within the Government who believe that the European courts should not be allowed to undermine ministers’ attempts to end the Channel crossings.

One of the leading MPs behind the move, Danny Kruger, Boris Johnson’s former political secretary, said: “The public won’t forgive us if we fail again.”

“They expect us to fix illegal immigration – even if the European Court tries to stop us. This Bill is our last chance to make sure that safe and legal routes are the only way to claim asylum in the UK.”

The Bill places a legal duty on the Home Secretary to remove migrants who arrive in the UK back to their home country or to a third country such as Rwanda where they can claim asylum.

The amendments would also empower the Government to ignore Strasbourg injunctions, such as the one that blocked the first deportation flight to Rwanda last June.

The explanatory notes for the amendments state: “The provisions of the Bill should operate notwithstanding any judgments, interim measures or other decisions of the European Court of Human Rights, or any other international court or tribunal, or any other international law obligation.”

The move comes as the Refugee Council warned that the Government would have to find accommodation for up to 193,000 migrants whose asylum claims were deemed inadmissible over the next three years but whom they could not remove from the UK.

This would be equivalent to requiring 1,493 hotels, compared with the 450 being used to house 51,000. The council’s analysis suggested this would land the Government with a bill of more than £9 billion a year.

Enver Solomon, its chief executive, said: “This draconian legislation stains our country’s reputation for fairness in the face of adversity. All the evidence shows that the vast majority of those who come here by so-called irregular routes are refugees escaping bombs and bullets, violence and persecution.”

A Home Office source said: “The Bill will have a massive deterrent effect on small boat crossings on the Channel. People simply won’t make the journey from northern France for thousands of pounds if they believe they are going to be detained and swiftly removed.”

◆ The Red Arrows could be forced out of their base by plans to turn the Dambusters’ former home into a migrant camp, council leaders have warned. The RAF’s elite aerial display team could have to find a new home because it would no longer be allowed to fly over the Dambusters’ old base at RAF Scampton in Lincolnshire, if there were 1,500 migrants living there, say West Lindsey district council chiefs.

Sir Mark Rowley, Commissioner of the Met, said the findings of the review were ‘heartbreaking’ and ‘deeply upsetting’ leader, urged the Government to accept the findings in full, saying it was vital if reform was to be achieved.

Lady Casey expressed disappointment that the Met had not accepted the term, but said she would judge the force on its actions in the coming weeks and months.

Baroness Lawrence, the mother of Stephen, accused the Met of being “rotten to the core” and said little had changed in the Met since her son’s murder in 1993.

Lady Casey’s review, which was published yesterday, accused the Met of being “broken” and said the force had lost the trust and consent of the people it was supposed to protect.

It was commissioned following the kidnap, rape and murder of Sarah Everard, by serving Met officer Wayne Couzens. Examples of bullying, racism, misogyny and homophobia that were documented in the 363-page review laid bare the scale of the crisis in Britain’s biggest force.

Sir Mark described the findings as “disturbing”, “upsetting” and “heart-breaking”, adding: “To be part of an organisation that has let individuals down so badly is deeply upsetting. And that’s where part of my own motivation comes from.”

“Because we have to right this wrong. We have to deal with these cultural problems. And the vast majority of my colleagues are up for this.”

But Ken Marsh, the head of the Metropolitan Police Federation, which represents rank and file officers, warned that the report would further dishearten those whose morale was already at rock bottom.

He said: “We absolutely accept the findings but we have to be a little bit careful here. Are we saying every Met Police officer is racist and homophobic? That is quite dangerous.”

He said: “Met colleagues are on their knees. We have a broken force, they are just leaving in their droves. Without police you don’t have society. You have a lawless society.”

Rishi Sunak, the Prime Minister and a father-of-two, conceded that trust in the Met had been “hugely damaged”.

“Ultimately I want both my daughters to grow up in a society in which not only do they have real trust in the police, it’s just fundamentally safe,” he said.

Sadiq Khan, the Mayor of London, described the publication of the review as “one of the darkest days in the history of the Met”.

“It’s in all of our interests to make sure that the police service changes, root and branch,” he added.

‘Going forward’ is the new full stop on our ‘journey’ to a greener Army

Sketch

By Tim Stanley

Do you remember Annabel Goldie? Used to run the Scottish Tories; pearls, a mop of wildish hair, sounded like a headmistress. Turns out she’s now in the Lords and a minister for defence, deploying her hockey sticks charm at a committee inquiry into the greening of the Armed Forces. She’s the perfect choice. The Baroness’s hair could provide refuge for a nest of starlings.

The Government wants to hit net zero carbon emissions by 2050, a goal the military takes “very, very seriously”, she said, with the “ caveat that we exist to protect the nation”.

Squaring this circle triggered the greatest onslaught of bureaucratic gibberish ever heard in a country where “going forward” is the new full stop. Sat next to Annabel was James Clare, director of levelling up, the Union, climate change and sustainability, a list of fantasy titles to rival Idi Amin’s claim to be a doctor of philosophy and the Queen of England. His present mission is to cut pollution in the Armed Forces. “Quite a lot of work to date”, he explained, “has been about understanding where we are now”, opening the door to “broader, holistic work to truly understand where we need to go to”.

Tobias Ellwood, chairman of the committee, interrupted him to note that he had recently visited RAF Marham and was invited to go around the base on electric scooters. But, as Ellwood noted, the fuel they saved by not using a car “wouldn’t even match what would be required to get an F-35 [jet] out of a hanger”.

Ah, said Clare, but in future, jets will use hybrid green fuel. By 2050, the real question will be “is there enough supply of that fuel and will the price ... come down so that we can actually use [it]?”

Yikes. These planes are going to be very green indeed if we can’t get the fuel to fly them. Music to the ears of Greenpeace but also to Russia or China, which not only aren’t eco-friendly countries they’re not very friendly at all.

“We are on a journey,” said the Baroness, “a journey where we probably have more unanswered questions than we have answers to our questions.” But “the pace of our activity has really intensified... Our potential to accelerate our pace is becoming obvious”.

“Can you quantify that,” asked Derek Twigg MP. Can you give any examples of what you’ve actually done?!

“Structure”, she said, “I... asked my officials about the structure because I wanted to be clear that I understood how this all worked.”

“We’re on the start of a journey,” Clare repeated, making one suspect both he and the Baroness were quoting from a poster on the wall of their office (something with a mountain on it). When did this journey start?, asked Twigg. About 20 years ago, came the reply. So, the journey is proceeding very slowly? Well, said Clare, think of it as “a foundation stone that we’re building on to move forward.”

In a moment of silence, I think I heard a tweet in Baroness Goldie’s hair.

Overcrowded prisons mean dangerous driver goes free

By Charles Hymas HOME AFFAIRS EDITOR

A DANGEROUS driver who was under the influence of drugs when he led police on a high speed chase has been spared jail because of prison overcrowding.

A judge told Bobbie-Lee Beany, 23, who also had no licence and false plates on his van, that he would have been immediately sent to jail if it was not for the accommodation crisis in prisons.

The case came as Britain’s chief judicial adviser on sentencing told judges and magistrates they should consider sparing criminals from jail because of overcrowding.

Lord Justice William Davis, chairman of the sentencing council, said community service orders should be considered as alternatives because sending offenders to overcrowded prisons could hinder rehabilitation efforts.

It follows a court of appeal judgment in which a man who threw boiling water on the face of a prison officer in a serious assault was spared a six-month sentence due to the prisons crisis.

Beany’s driving last year was described in court as “exceptionally dangerous” and “no more than simple luck” that there was no injury or even death. He drove off after being stopped near Bluewater shopping centre in Greenhithe, Kent, shortly before midnight in April 22 last year, drove on the wrong side of the road, hit speeds of up to 100mph, swerved erratically and undertook other drivers.

He was finally cornered and caught on a housing estate after police put up a helicopter to track and find him. Tests shows he was over the legal limit for cocaine and benzoylecgonine, its breakdown by-product.

The labourer later pleaded guilty to dangerous driving, two offences of drug-driving, possessing cannabis, fraudulent use of a registration mark, and driving without a licence and without insurance.

Imposing a 14-month jail term suspended for 18 months and a two-year driving ban on Monday, Judge Robert Lazarus told Beany that despite his guilty plea and remorse, he “ticked all the boxes” in respect of aggravating factors. “This was exceptionally dangerous driving indeed,” he said.

Cut jail terms for killers of abusive partners, says KC

By Charles Hymas

FEMALE victims of coercive control should have shorter sentences if they kill their abusive partners, a government review has recommended.

The study for the Ministry of Justice (MoJ) said courts should take account of coercive control as a potential “mitigating” factor in domestic homicide. It also said judges should consider the lower culpability for a killing if the perpetrator was a victim of coercive control.

They are among a series of recommendations being considered by the Government under the review by Clare Wade KC, the defence barrister for Sally Challen, the first woman to have her conviction for murdering her husband quashed under coercive control laws.

Last week the Government confirmed it would increase sentences for killers who subjected victims to domestic abuse to at least 25 years in jail. However, ministers resisted calls from women’s groups to change the rules for victims of domestic abuse who kill their partners. The review also recommended infidelity should not be a mitigating factor in domestic homicide.

Hill turns down chance of second term as DPP

By Jack Hardy CRIME CORRESPONDENT

MAX HILL KC, the Director of Public Prosecutions, has announced he is stepping down after five years in the role.

As head of the Crown Prosecution Service (CPS), he will leave when his appointment ends in October, after he decided not to seek a second term.

During his tenure, the CPS has battled to improve catastrophically low prosecution rates of defendants accused of sexual offences which fuelled accusations that rape had effectively been decriminalised.

Mr Hill was challenged about the issue as he announced his decision to leave on BBC Radio 4’s Law in Action and said the CPS had seen “really significant change over the last two years”.

He said: “Rape remains a horrifying, devastating crime. It has required in my time here... a whole-system, end-to-end approach to improve what we are doing because you can only achieve a conviction and therefore sentence if you operate together.”

Mr Hill previously served as the independent reviewer of terrorism laws.
